What is "trauma-informed care"?

Trauma-informed care refers to a growing body of knowledge, multiple sets of tools for practitioners, and an approach to providing care -- usually healthcare and social services. While it is a complex field, one of its primary aims involves helping practitioners to understand how client and patient trauma shape medical, psychological, and communal experience, and affect the provision of care and outcomes associated with care.

“I had the privilege to hear the team from Repair speak about trauma informed care last fall. It was very well done and timely information. Trauma impacts us every day, either directly or through those seeking spiritual care and healing. This is an important and timely learning opportunity.”
